A COMPARISON OF JOHN F. KENNEDY AND BARACK OBAMA

GRIN Verlag Nov 2013, 2013. Taschenbuch. Book Condition: Neu. 211x144x7 mm. This item is printed on demand - Print on Demand Neuware - Seminar paper from the year 2013 in the subject English - Applied Geography, grade: noch nicht bekannt, , language: English, abstract: In 2008 a promise of hope and change, especially for Americans, but also for all others went around the world. 'Yes, We Can' was a synonym for the 'American Dream'. It was first said by a candidate of the Democratic Party, who wanted to become the first African American president. But Obama was not the first politician, who wanted to follow the citizen's wish for improvement of an old system and more humanity. Forty six years before, another man told all Americans, that 'We Can Do Better'. The meaning and choice of words is quite similar. Both talked about solidarity, a wind of change and equality of all people, because 'We' means everybody without exceptions. But is it only the slogan, which shows similarities of both or do they have more in common than this And why is research and knowledge about it necessary In my opinion we should have a constant awareness and knowledge about failures and procedures in the past, also in foreign affairs, in view of their influence on our current and future situation. As the biggest economic and military power, the United States of America have had huge influence on Europe and the rest of the world. To understand and analyse America's policy, it is best to focus on its head of state, the president. So, I concentrated on the current democratic president Barack Obama by comparing him to the former democratic president John F. Kennedy. Often Barack Obama is called the black Kennedy, as a person on whom hopes are focused...
