Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: . . . cant. 1 The enthusiasm following the war led to the immediate establishment of a large number of periodicals; the failure of these produced a temporary reaction; and a decade later the movement was resumed. A considerable number of the magazines begun in the later years of the period were religious. Of this time also are most of the attempts to enlighten the masses and a considerable number of the lighter and ladies magazines. 3 THE ANNUALS. As if the magazines were not numerous enough to give every aspiring author a chance to publish his work, further opportunity was given by the annuals. These were gift-books with fanciful titles⁴ and elaborate bindings, containing light miscellany in prose and verse, and usually a number of engravings. They made their appearance just before the holiday season, and were the fashionable remembrances of the day. The idea was borrowed...
